The value of a Bitcoin, per Coindesk, is $43,741.59.

July 28, 2010: In the early days, a Bitcoin cost investors just 6¢ each. That $100 investment would now be worth (brace yourself) $72,902,650.

Dec. 12, 2011: It didn't take long for Bitcoin to gain ground. Within a year, it was selling for $3.19, meaning your $100 would buy you 31.3 Bitcoin—which are worth $1,371,210 today.

Dec. 10, 2012: By late 2012, Bitcoin had jumped to $13.54 each. Your $100 would have a current value of $323,055.

Dec. 16, 2013: This is the year that Bitcoin began its real climb. By December, it was selling for $638, which (at the time) seemed unthinkable. You'd have only gotten a portion of a Bitcoin for your $100, but it would still be worth $6,856.

Dec. 8, 2014: The rally, it seemed, was over. Bitcoin had slumped to $350 in late 2014. It would have been a good time to buy. A $100 investment would have a value of $12,498 today.

Dec. 7, 2015: Call it the calm before the storm. Bitcoin rose to $424 over 12 months, a reasonable surge. Had you put $100 into it, that investment would have increased to $10,316.

Dec. 12, 2016: You can almost hear the bomb ticking at this point. Bitcoin was trading for $780. Your $100 invested then would fetch $5,608 today.

Dec. 10, 2017: Bitcoin-mania was fully underway by this point, with prices exploding to $13,160. That $100 would today be worth $332.

Dec. 14, 2018: Newton's law applies to cryptocurrencies too, sometimes. Prices had plunged throughout the year, dropping to $3,212.21. It wasn't a bad buying opportunity, apparently. A $100 spend then would be worth $1,362.

Dec. 17, 2019: Things were climbing again; a Bitcoin was worth $6,584.03, but even the most enthusiastic traders had no idea what the coming year would bring. Your $100 investment right before the pandemic would be worth $664 now.

Dec. 5, 2020: The g-force from Bitcoin's climb in 2020 would make even an experienced astronaut black out. By early December, the cryptocurrency was worth $19,045.02. That $100 would be worth $230 today. You're doubling your money in a short time, but somehow it's still not satisfying.
